The Presenter

Dr. Rob Turrisi is currently a Professor at Penn State University with a joint appointment in the Department of Biobehavioral Health Prevention Research Center. He has conducted parent-based interventions to prevent adolescent drinking, drunk driving, binge drinking, skin cancer, and unintended pregnancies. During his tenure, he has received significant grant funding to study teen decision-making and parent-teen communication with respect to teen drinking and drunk driving. Dr. Turrisi also serves as a consultant/grant reviewer for the National Institute of Health, National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism and National Institute on Child Health and Human Development.

The workshop focuses on the role of parents in reducing student alcohol-related risks and how higher education personnel can involve parents in supporting college/university policies. The many ways parents influence behavior, the influence of students perceptions of parental approval/disapproval and the importance of parental modeling are a few of the topics to be discussed.
